Pond Dialogue:

FROGS & TOADS

From Kathryn Barton,
"Frog and Toad lover in Dallas, TX"

The question Chuck was addressing was "I have hundreds of tadpoles in my pond. How do I get rid of them, or do I need to?" This is an opportunity to give your readers a reality check. They need to realize, if you build it, they (frogs and toads) will come. These creatures are part of and beneficial to a pond system. There is no need to get rid of them. Welcome them to your pond and they will help manage the insect and slug population in your garden. If someone does not enjoy the spring and summer evening frog and toad chorus, situate the pond away from your bedroom. Better yet, ponds may not be for you at all. These people will be happier with a chemically treated swimming pool or fountain.

From Kathy Thirtyacre

"Who is digging a frog bog this very weekend!"
From <http://www.frogweb.gov>: "Recent reports show that many amphibian populations are undergoing declines and even extinctions. These losses are important both because of the reduction in biodiversity and because amphibians are sensitive biological indicators of the health of the environment. Although habitat destruction is a major reason for declines, there may be additional factors such as chemical pollution, increased UV-B radiation, fungi, parasites, and predation."

Kathy offers two solutions for the pondkeeper who doesn't want frogs in the pond:

One would be to agree with one of Chuck's other solutions of removing the offending frog and toad romantic pairs to a natural pond. Especially important if bullfrogs are eating the pet fish.

The other would be to set up a tadpole nursery. In some ponds, an overload of tadpoles, especially toad tadpoles, can overwhelm the filter and harm the resident fish. How to make a tadpole nursery:

Needed: one kiddie wading pool, pond water, some gravel, a bunch of underwater plants from the pond, a net, and a rock. Set up the wading pool in a part of the yard that gets some sun and more shade. Fill the bottom with gravel or pebbles. Fill with pond water and a goodly amount of underwater plants. Net out the offending eggs or tadpoles into the wading pool.

Throw in some leaf litter, untreated by herbicides or pesticides. Test for ammonia once in awhile. If you see any ammonia, do a water change from the pond and throw in some more underwater plants. If you get carried away, you can lightly boil some organic lettuce and toss in. add a large rock or stick to allow new froglets or toadlets to exit the pond.

If you can put up with the noise and love songs and take some extra time to raise up the resulting children (think of it as froggie-toadie foster care), you will be rewarded with bug and slug-eating machines in your garden. And you will help out some critters who desperately need it. ♡
